Industry Distribution

Market Outlook

In December 2025, HSI opened near a recent high of approximately 26,100 before entering a period of heightened volatility. The index subsequently declined to a mid month low of around 25,200, before gradually recovering toward the end of the month and closing the year at approximately 25,630. Looking ahead to 2026, China is expected to maintain a moderately accommodative monetary policy stance. A sustained low interest rate environment should continue to enhance the relative attractiveness of Hong Kong equities and support capital inflows. In addition, expectations of a weaker U.S. dollar and lower U.S. Treasury yields may further encourage global investment into the region. Coupled with ongoing policy support for technological innovation, the Hong Kong equity market is well positioned for more synchronized growth in 2026.

Commentary

The Hang Seng Index declined by 0.9% in December, ending 2025 with a full year gain of 27.8%. By comparison, the CASH Prime Value Equity Fund concluded the year with a 35.1% gain, continuing to outperform the HSI by approximately 13% on a cumulative basis since inception, despite market weakness in the fourth quarter.

During the month, we increased portfolio exposure to the financials and materials sectors, reflecting our positive assessment of their medium term growth prospects. Market consensus anticipates a gradual recovery in growth momentum in 2026, led by the consumer discretionary, materials, and information technology sectors. We will continue to actively monitor these areas and further diversify the portfolio to manage volatility while capitalizing on emerging investment opportunities.
